The economic justification for intermittent and unpredictable forms of renewable power generation is coming under increasingly critical scrutiny, nationally and internationally, because of the need for back-up generating capacity (usually fossil-fuelled). Wind turbines are also widely disliked by the public and have been subject to many strong protest campaigns within Melton Borough and elsewhere. It therefore seems perversely provocative to include the table of acceptable turbine heights on page 122, which gives the impression of acceptability for turbines in these locations.
